Jack thought, "If I talk to a lawyer, it will cost me a lot. I don't like to waste money." Then Jack had an idea. He visited a young lawyer, who had little work in the town. He said, "I want to take my neighbor to court. I will pay for your services only if you think I will win the case in court." "All right. So, you will pay me only if I think you can win," said the lawyer.

Jack told the lawyer about the problem. After listening carefully, the lawyer said, "I am sure you will win your case. May I take your case to court?" As he was disappointed, Jack stood up and said, "No, thank you. I don't want to take it to court." "What about my fee?" the lawyer asked. Jack said, "I'll not pay you because I will not win. In parts of Africa, wars have been going on for many years. Everyday life in countries such as Sudan, Ethiopia, and Somalia is difficult. Millions of people have lost their homes, markets, and hospitals. In these conditions, food supplies disappear and people face hunger. During the past ten years, international aid organizations have done their best to help prevent hunger by (a) sending food to people in the war areas.

However, this is (b) a short-term solution. Most aid workers agree that giving food to a country in war is only a temporary measure. It may save some people from immediate hunger, but it doesn't change the conditions that lead to hunger. The aid workers say that the first thing to do is (c) to try to stop the fighting. The international group needs to help the warring groups find a way to make peace.

Some international aid organizations are thinking of changing (d) the way they help. They say that giving food can actually help keep a war going. Sudan is an example of a country that has received aid worth billions of dollars during its long war. This aid has made very little difference in the lives of the Sudanese people. Soldiers have stolen the food and local leaders have used it to control people. (e) Food aid has sometimes caused people to become dependent. Therefore, it is most important for international groups to try to bring peace to warring countries.
