When people are closed to messages, they have their arms folded or their legs crossed. This body language usually means that people are rejecting your message.

If people lean forward with their bodies toward you, they are actively engaged in your message. They may be accepting or rejecting it, but their minds are on what you are saying. On the other hand, if people lean back in their chairs or perform activities such as drawing or cleaning their eyeglasses, you know that they are either passively taking in your message or that they are ignoring it. In either case, they are not very much engaged in the conversation.
